

Nerubashchenko I.,

postgraduate of the department of political sciences, State institution Southern National Pedagogical University named after K.D. Ushinsky (Odesa, Ukraine). E-mail: pnpu_politolog2010@mail.ru.

Subjective part of a global civil society: analysis approaches

Abstract. This article explores approaches to defining the entities that make up the global civil society. It is shown that the main subject is the international non-governmental organization, but increases the importance of other actors – collective and individual. Emphasized that global civil society is a complex system social structures, which are characterized by mix of members (institutions actors) and their voluntary associations and unions, social groups and nations. It includes a variety of volunteer associations, interest groups, non-profit and charitable associations, as well as less formal and stable forms of social organization, social network diaspora, social forums etc.*

Emphasizes the importance of global civil society actors as academic institutions, business clubs and related network defenders of consumer rights, human rights activists, various initiatives to promote cooperation, environmental movements, ethnic groups, foundations, unions, groups of local people and organizations which provides help, peace movements, professional organizations, religious organizations, think tanks, network of women, youth associations, etc.

It is shown that subjects can be attributed «man Transnational», which connects their needs and interests not only with «their» state, but also with non-state social structures of transnational origin and with the world community as a whole. We have that outlook «transnational» personality transcends national borders, focused on planetary problems communication which are based on openness and tolerance. Despite the increasing role of the individual persons in forming of global civil society, its basis is the global movement of non-governmental organizations (environmental, anti-war, cultural, religious and other). That serve as alternatives or informal channels of communication in the global community, promote building confidence between peoples.

Key words: global civil society, globalization, international non-governmental organizations (INGOs).